Establishing globally competitive research careers: developing your international toolkit

Professor Kathy TAKAYAMA

Executive Director for Professional Development and Diversity, Equity, and Inclusion; and Interim Dean of Faculty Affairs, Okinawa Institute of Science and Technology

This seminar will present the multiple facets of establishing an internationally competitive research group.

International best practices and strategies will be presented to encourage participants to develop their “toolkit” to allow them to navigate the dynamic needs and contexts for leading a research group. We will explore how to create productive and inclusive research climates that engage the experiences and backgrounds of all members of the team and establish a climate of trust and belonging. Discussions will highlight how biases that compromise career advancement critically impact minority populations at different stages. A global mindset takes into account the barriers that evolve throughout the work-life ecosystem. By strategically integrating internationally oriented leadership development with your mentorship networks into your toolkit, you will learn how to build potential for new pathways for career development.
